For 100 years, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has been standing up for American businesses—large and small. We've fought to ensure the business community has a seat at the table, a voice in the debate, and a stake in the policy decisions that influence America's future. Throughout this year, we'll be celebrating our 100th anniversary (check out the interactive timeline and video). But our focus is on the future. We face new challenges and uncertainty, and it will take the power of free enterprise and the initiative of businesses to overcome them.

Today, Tom Donohue delivered his annual State of American Business Address where he outlined five immediate priorities that the Chamber will address to boost America's competitiveness in the global economy: producing American energy; rebuilding our infrastructure; expanding trade, investment, and tourism; advancing regulatory and legal reforms; and developing an innovation agenda.

In addition to these priorities, the Chamber will continue into the next 100 years with its mission of protecting the principles of American free enterprise and bringing together like-minded supporters to discuss and advocate for free market policies. Today, we launched the new FreeEnterprise.com, an innovative platform for free market news and ideas. The site aggregates the Chamber's greatest content, and includes newsmaker interviews, opinion pieces, and social and multi media.

We hope you'll share this exciting new resource with your networks, come back daily for fresh content, and join the conversation.
